Family therapy with sculptures. Integrating Psychodrama and Attachment Theory

The work with sculptures in Family Therapy has been used from the Systemic therapy, developed first by Kantor et al (Duhl, Kantor y Duhl, 1973) in the Family Institute in Boston and Papp, Silverstein and Carter (1973) from Family Institute of New York. Jaime Rojas Bermudez (1966), one of my teachers in Psychodrama, worked also with sculptures (he named them images) in Psychodrama. I have been working for more than 25 years with sculptures with families using psychodramatic techniques (mirror, doubling, role reverse, soliloquy, etc.). In my therapeutic interventions, I introduce also the principles of Attachment Theory, being the first aim of the therapy the creation of a secure base, trying to adapt my interventions to the individual or family needs, more than to the theory.

The Presenter:

I studied psychology in Barcelona and after that, I got training in group analysis, psychodrama, integrative psychotherapy, attachment theory and did many seminars about family systems. Since 1979 I have always worked in Public Mental Health System in Terrassa, Reus, Tarragona and from 1992 in Girona (Catalonia, Spain), where I have worked for 27 years as clinical psychologist, and service manager in infant and adolescence mental health service from 1992. My main work was with families and in the community, working in coordination with primary health care teams, educational psychologists of schools and high schools and with teachers too, social services workers and educators of foster care centers. I also collaborate as teacher in the University of Girona in a master about Attachment and families in social risk. IAGP member from 1995. I am a board member from 2012, and from 2018, I am the Secretary.
